The age in which our lot is cast contributes its proportion to the progress of that revolution which affects what is sacred as well as what is secular; and which reaches both the sentiments of individuals and the policy of States. These reciprocally act upon each other. To this revolutionary process our own country is not a stranger. That remarkable political and moral phenomenon, - the Declaration of our Independence, - which proclaimed the birth of a nation, destined to make developments and to exemplify principles of deep interest to man, was one, and a commanding one, of those events that engage attention, awaken thought, and rouse the mind to action. It has been followed by results which concern the future and embrace interests not limited by narrow bounds. The principles of that event pertain to man, and to it, civilized man throughout the world has been, and is, turning some of his most earnest thoughts, and profoundest reflections. The principles of representative Democracy, first exemplified upon a large scale, and in a form which promises permanency, by these United States, have shaken the thrones of Kings, extorted concessions to oppressed humanity, and have made both the despot and his vassal feel that they are men: - the former that he is dependent, the latter that he has power. The truth has been proclaimed and the example has been given, assuring all, that man is...
