At Newnham the cliff affords a section of certain beds among the red So termed from the bright golden appearance of the iron pyrites found in the lias: marls which can be traced, with some intermediate breaks, for a considerable distance northward, occasionally containing organic remains, fish teeth, palates, and defensive fin bones, with bivalve shells, and marking a state of things, for a time, favourable to the existence of animal life, amid a series of deposits not so characterised. These beds most frequently consist, though often modified, of gray sandstones and shales, with traces of calcareous matter. The maps of the Survey will show the course of these beds northward, a separate colour having been assigned to them, and the complicated form they assume will present a view of the minor undulations of the upper part of the new red sandstone series, such undulations being also cut by those of the present surface of the ground. Proceeding northward from the vicinity of Newnham, and...
